Topic

The conference is a collaboration between the Leibniz Institute for Jewish History and Culture – Simon Dubnow, Leipzig, and the Unit of Judaic Studies / Munich Research Centre of Jewish Arabic Cultures at the University of Munich. It examines the influence of Muslim rule on Jewish and, by extension, Samaritan literature, with a specific focus on religious texts, including translations of the Bible.

Although Jewish and Samaritan literary production under Islamic rule has received considerable scholarly attention, this conference aims to deepen understanding by analyzing how the realities of Muslim political authority and Islamic intellectual traditions affected or shaped Jewish and Samaritan religious writings. Instead of concentrating only on coexistence or cultural flourishing, the conference explores how Jewish and Samaritan authors responded – textually, linguistically, and theologically – to the Islamic environment in which they lived. This includes how Islamic models of thought, language, and literary forms left their mark on Jewish and Samaritan religious expression.

The conference's scope covers Al-Andalus, the Middle East, Iran, and the Ottoman Empire, from the early Islamic period to the late modern era (roughly 900–1900).
